Let's take a look at W-4s. As we all know, this is the document that employees turn in to an employer to calculate federal and (sometimes) state withholdings.

There was once a time when – if the employee turned in a W-4 with more than 10 exemptions – the W-4 needed to be sent to the federal government for verification. This requirement no longer exists, except for California state withholdings.

Elsewhere, a lock-in letter replaced this requirement. If an employer receives a lock-in letter from the IRS, the employer is then required to use the IRS calculation of exemptions instead of the employee W-4. The rare exception is if an employee submits a new W-4 with more taxes that are calculated than the lock-in letter-again, this is very rare. A lock-in letter trumps a W-4 and must be put in place by the contain the employee demographic information, marital status, and the number of exemptions, with an area for additional dollar amount of withholding and a box for exempt. Any alteration of this, like set percentage or set dollar amount of withholding, voids the W-4. If the employer does not have a valid W-4 for the employee, the employer is required to use either Single 0 or the last valid W-4 they have on file for the employee. Also, make sure you are using the correct year W-4 when the employee submits it to the employer.

Now let's look at the states. The W-4 is a federal document, and several states – but not all – accept the federal W-4. Below is a chart of states and what they accept. If the state has their own withholding form, then the federal W-4 is not allowed for state calculation of withholdings. You'll notice that Pennsylvania does not have a state W-4-this is because the rate is a set percentage.

Knowing the federal and state W-4 rules will assist you in correct calculations of withholdings and can assist employees with the requirements.
