demands on human resource managers to find the talent they need.

Feb. 21, 2014

According to a new survey, the job market is improving and putting additional demands on human resource managers to find the talent they need. According to the survey from by job site CareerBuilder, employers expect the job market to improve in 2014, but already more than half of human resource managers report that they cannot find qualified candidates for open positions. Almost half of human resource managers report that these jobs are going unfilled for three months or longer.

The U.S. government's inability to deliver a clear and long-term solution to the debt-ceiling issue is affecting hiring. The problem seems to get resolved, but recently the debt-ceiling issue made headlines about a possible default. The latest news is that the debt-ceiling issue is resolved for another year. We hope so because America's political stalemate makes managers reluctant to hire full time workers until they
