

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us important marketing concept of the mobile age. YOUTility is a new way of marketing your firm's services that enables you to become inherently and genuinely useful to prospects and clients.

Kristy Short • May. 12, 2014

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

If you haven't heard of the YOUtility concept, you are missing out on the most important marketing concept of the mobile age. YOUtility is a new way of marketing your firm's services that enables you to become inherently and genuinely useful to prospects and clients.

At the core of this concept is helping. And you accomplish this by supplying clients

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

The pervasiveness of the Internet and fundamental shifts in how consumers research products and services has changed the game. Research shows that business-to-business customers have 70 percent of the purchase decision completed before they ever contact the company. This is true in the accounting profession as well.

Potential clients are “secret shopping” accountants—looking for services information, online reviews, and other digital cues about your value and expertise. Potential clients are out there looking, so it makes sense to push out as much information online as you can—info that’s as helpful as you can make it.

This concept of offering information that is so useful people would actually pay for it if you asked them to is derived from the New York Times best-selling business book YOUTILITY, by Jay Baer. The book (and its companion eBook, YOUTILITY for Accountants) shows that business success is all about helping—not sales and marketing hype.

Giving away valuable, educational resources and information is a way to break through the messaging clutter to earn consumer trust and eventually convert them to clients. As Jay wrote, “Sell something, and you make a client. Help someone, and you make a client for life.” And because helping is at the core of what accounting professionals do every day, this makes perfect sense.

To better understand YOUtility and how it relates to the accounting profession, I went to the expert, Jay Baer.

Kristy: Why should accountants take the time to understand the YOUtility concept?

Jay: Selecting an accountant is an important, measured decision for most people. The ramifications of that decision are long-lasting. As such, even more than in most industries, potential accounting clients are hyper-researching their options—seeking to augment personal referrals with other information that ratifies or helps guide their decision. The way for accountants to “get on the radar” of their potential

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us national firm with a defined niche: veterinary practices. The firm's owner, Glenn Hanner, and his team, made this shift by being incredibly useful to veterinarians. The firm sends a strong signal about its category of expertise, using www.VetCPA.com as their domain name and providing an extraordinary animated demonstration video on their site that identifies the unique challenges faced by vets and outlines how Hanner can help. Hanner is doing an amazing job with YOUtility marketing overall.

Kristy: What types of communications should firms be pushing out and what are some of the best vehicles to deliver helpful content—blogs, social media, etc.?

Jay: A blog is a great place to start, because it has shelf-life and it enables accountants to demonstrate expertise in a somewhat more comprehensive way. Social media is important too, but mostly as an amplification tool. Content (like a blog) is fire; social media is the accelerant.

Kristy: Anything else that accountants should know to help them become “genuinely and inherently useful?”

Jay: Don't be afraid to transcend the transaction. You can and should provide information that's relevant to your clients and prospective clients, even if that information is not about accounting per se. Give yourself permission to make the story BIGGER. The YOUTILITY for Accountants e-book is a great resource to start with because it is chocked full of detail on the YOUtility concept and case studies of successful accounting firms that have accelerated their businesses with YOUtility marketing. There are lots of examples in the book of how to build your practice by being useful.

Marketing takes on a whole new meaning when you view it from the client's perspective. Consumers today don't want to be inundated with sales-heavy hype; they want help, instruction, and information that is useful. YOUtility is the concept that meets the needs of today's online-researching clients and prospects, and the

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

CPA Practice Advisor is registered with the National Association of State Boards of Accountancy (NASBA) as a sponsor of continuing professional education on the National Registry of CPE Sponsors.

© 2024 Firmworks, LLC. All rights reserved