

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us and demographics and cannot be reduced to one single initiative.

Oct. 19, 2012

A silver bullet marketing idea is a farce. There is always more behind the scenes of any successful marketing campaign than a mere 'idea'. In addition, success of a campaign depends largely on your firm's makeup, goals, and demographics and cannot be reduced to one single initiative. It takes hitting on all cylinders to really make a difference from one year to the next.

A favorite marketing quote that I tend to come back to is "small hinges swing big doors." The small hinge in this example is speaking the language of your target market across all mediums. This includes websites, presentations, mail pieces, etc. It's not easy to drill down the language at large, but it's made easier given the technology tools, like Google Trends, now available at our fingertips.

Many of us marketers go off of our 'gut' which can get us in trouble as many time as it can aid us. Google Trends allows us to test our 'gut' with TONS of data (catchy terms these days is 'Big Data') that is free and readily available.

Here is a fresh example of how to use Google Trends if you are thinking about refreshing your website or other marketing campaigns:

Real-Life Example:

You are starting a blog or section on your website whereby you hope to give advice to your personal tax clients. You plan to notify them via email and mail regarding this new section in order to get traction on the site quicker than pure organic growth.

Question:

What wording should you use to reflect the language used in the market at large? Is

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

- Make sure you narrow your search to where your client base is (example: USA). Otherwise, Google Trends will analyze the entire world wide web, which could skew your results. You can even narrow down to a region or state.
- Keep in mind that the Google Trends analysis is reflective of all searches, not necessarily your target market. This is more relevant of an exercise for a tax shop focused on individuals of all kinds versus the shop that goes after SEC audits. Either way, the results can still provide you with helpful data.

In the real-life example, Google Trends shows that your clientele want 'help' more than 'advice' or 'strategy'. You can then take that information and start using the word 'help' across all mediums, versus some of these other terms, since it is striking more of a chord with your audience.

Full Report: Rising/Related Terms

The above chart is only a fraction of the value gained via Google Trends. The real gold is in the rising/related terms found in the full report. In the lower right of the full report, you will see a few terms as it relates to the 'master' term as well as things to have on your radar. The 'rising' search terms are the types of things you should blog about because they are rising topics of interest.

---

Roy Keely is the VP of Market Strategy at Xcentric and is charged with articulating Xcentric's value proposition to the accounting community. Roy offers a broad range of experience in marketing, sales and consulting and is passionate about technology, productivity and market strategy. He enjoys writing and speaking to professional service firms looking to bring practical insight and action to their firms and was recognized in The CPA Practice Advisor "40 Under 40" for 2012. Roy graduated from the University of Houston with a degree in marketing. He can be reached at info@xcentric.com.

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

© 2024 Firmworks, LLC. All rights reserved