

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us regulation, which is both emotionally charged and unlikely to be resolved soon.

Dave McClure • Nov. 12, 2014

Two years ago, in the wake of the election ballots legalizing recreational use of marijuana, I wrote a small blog post noting that as a new and rapidly-growing industry, there might be an opportunity for a new accounting practice area.

The response was immediate, if predictable. The editor replaced my official photo with a picture of Cheech Marin; I got invitations to speak at CPA conferences across the land; and two CPAs in Colorado anonymously sent me joints so I could, as one put it, “write more accurately about the subject.”

All this as two more states – Oregon and Alaska — and the District of Columbia joined the ranks of places where recreational use has become legal. The number of states with some form of legal use has grown to 26, including 19 that authorized

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

To begin with, it has been difficult to estimate tax revenues from an industry led by home-growers and black marketers. Early revenues, however, were in the range of $30 million per month, which would result in new tax revenues of up to $7.5 million for the counties in which marijuana sales are legal. The Washington Post notes that the industry could eventually reach $35 billion in revenues – larger than those of the NFL, and roughly equivalent to the size of the US newspaper industry.

It seems too early to make any sweeping financial generalizations based on such a short history. Nor am I interested in gauging the social impacts of marijuana legalization, which is both emotionally charged and unlikely to be resolved soon.

But the social aspects are a part of the equation for accountants. It is reasonable to assume that someone is doing the accounting and tax work for the thousands of businesses that have cropped up to serve these new legal markets. It is also reasonable to assume that this practice area is not something the firm wants to put on its letterhead until the matter is a little better settled.

So now, two years later, the advice remains the same. This is a growth industry that isn't likely to go away, and will need accounting and tax services. Not to mention financial planning, partnership management, merger and acquisition support and the other services of a growth industry. Any firm that is not actively engaged in at least evaluating its potential may be missing the opportunity of the decade.

Income Tax • Legislation • Small Business

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us