gap and get instant, personalized recommendations on articles, videos, courses, conferences and other learning resources to master that area. The framework was developed by some of the profession's top subject matter experts.

“Professional education isn’t about how much time you spend in front of a computer or how long you sit through a presentation,” said Clar Rosso, the AICPA’s vice president of member learning and competency. “It’s about gaining knowledge and expertise that can take you and your career to the next level. That’s why a competency-based approach to professional development makes so much sense.”

One new feature of the website is “knowledge checks,” or multiple-choice quizzes on specific topics. An inaccurate answer will trigger links to AICPA learning resources on that topic. CPAs also can find nearby conferences and other learning opportunities by leveraging location-based searches. The site is free and mobile-friendly, so users can assess their knowledge and learn through any device at any time.
