

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us his or her personnel file, a job accommodation, or someone else to pick up his or her paycheck, will you know how to respond? Here are some guidelines for handling these ...

Aug. 18, 2017

If an employee comes to you with a request for employment verification, access to his or her personnel file, a job accommodation, or someone else to pick up his or her paycheck, will you know how to respond? Here are some guidelines for handling these types of requests.

#1: Employment Verification:

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us authenticity of the request with the employee and obtain a written authorization to disclose the requested information. Note: If the outside entity is a court or government agency and is ordering you to provide the information, you generally don't need the employee's authorization but it's a best practice to let the employee know you received the order.

- Determine what information to provide. Decide what information you are willing to provide. While some employers refuse to provide any type of employment verification information unless required to do so (such as by a court, law, or regulation), most employers will provide at least some information. In many cases, the lender, landlord, or government agency will provide the employer with a form requesting specific employment verification information. Make sure the authorization form signed by the employee covers the information being sought and only provide the information the employee authorized you to release. If the outside entity doesn't provide a form, consider using your company letterhead instead.
- Provide accurate information. Make sure the information is accurate by double-checking any employment dates, pay rates, and hours of work provided. Respond as promptly as possible and retain a copy of the employment verification in the employee's personnel file. As a best practice, designate a trained point of contact to handle employment verification requests.

#2: Access to Personnel Records:

An employee may ask to review his or her own personnel file. There is no federal law that requires employers to grant employees access to their own personnel file; however, several states do have such laws. If you are not subject to a specific requirement, you can decide how you want to handle the situation, as long as you apply the practice consistently (if you permit one employee to view their records, you must allow access under the same conditions for all employees who request it). It's a best practice to have a designated HR representative or manager present when the employee inspects their file. Absent a state requirement, you may also consider

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us states have similar requirements that apply to smaller employers, and some states have laws that require accommodations in additional circumstances, such as when an employee has a pregnancy-related condition.

If an employee notifies you (orally or in writing) that he or she needs an adjustment or change at work for a reason related to a medical condition or would like an accommodation for religious reasons, promptly begin the “interactive process,” or dialogue, with the employee to identify what, if any, reasonable accommodation should be provided. For disability-related accommodations, the conversation should be limited to the nature of the issue generating the request, the individual’s functional limitations, and accommodations that may be effective in meeting the individual’s needs. While employees aren’t required to make these requests in writing (or even use the term “reasonable accommodation”), make sure you thoroughly document the request, any follow-up discussions, and the resulting accommodation, if any.

#4: Paycheck Pickup:

There may be occasions when an employee asks you to give his or her paycheck to another individual because the employee is not available on payday. Generally, it is not a best practice to give an employee’s paycheck to another person even if it is authorized by the employee. However, if you do decide to allow another individual to pick up an employee’s paycheck, obtain the employee’s written permission and have the person who picks up the paycheck confirm his or her identity and provide written confirmation that he or she received the employee’s pay. When possible, encourage employees to use direct deposit so that they can easily receive their pay when they’re away from the workplace.

If the employee is unable to retrieve his or her paycheck because he or she is no longer with your company, make sure you comply with final pay deadlines and requirements. After verifying the employee's mailing address, you may be able to

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

(This article first appeared on the Connect@ADP blog.)

Payroll

CPA Practice Advisor is registered with the National Association of State Boards of Accountancy (NASBA) as a sponsor of continuing professional education on the National Registry of CPE Sponsors.

© 2024 Firmworks, LLC. All rights reserved