

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us this month, 83% of respondents said they were suffering financially because of the outbreak. Many groups have had to cancel fundraisers and in-person events ...

Apr. 29, 2020

As the ranks of the unemployed continue to swell and people's lives are upended because of the coronavirus outbreak, people might be wondering what they can do to help. Charitable giving could be a way to make a difference in these uncertain times.

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

Here are some strategies for how to approach your giving.

Choosing an organization

Are you concerned about first responders? Senior citizens? Something else? Think about which issues are important to you, and find an organization that does work in that realm. Or, if you're already supporting a group, increase your donation.

Experts suggest looking around your community and taking stock of how smaller organizations might be helping those in need.

Amir Pasic, the dean of the Indiana University Lilly Family School of Philanthropy, suggested asking neighbors where they donate. A way to make choosing an organization fun is to get your family members involved in the decision making. That can also help instill habits of generosity across generations.

Pasic also recommended considering smaller organizations.

"You might have a local nonprofit that does a lot of work but might not be as prominent," Pasic said.

Groups such as Giving Compass and Charity Navigator have compiled lists of COVID-19 response funds if you're looking to donate to organizations that are assisting with relief.

You can also think about contributing to donor-advised funds, which will help you take advantage of charitable tax benefits. You put money into an account, let it grow over time and then donate it. Large financial corporations such as Fidelity, Vanguard and J.P. Morgan can help with these types of accounts.

Do your homework

Take a look at the organization's website to get a sense of what it actually does in the

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us measure a group, experts say.

“Overhead is no longer looked at as the be-all, end-all,” said the Urban Institute’s Tomasko. She said overhead might be easy to measure, but it’s an inadequate metric that doesn’t account for attracting talent or other important factors.

You can also research nonprofits through various databases that evaluate their impact and financial data. Groups such as Guidestar, Give.org, and Charity Navigator are among those options. Guidestar, for example, has a profile on nonprofits sorted by programs, financials and operations. Charity Navigator employs analysts who assign star ratings to charities.

Not all groups meet the full criteria to be considered for evaluation, so if a charity isn’t rated on one of those websites, that doesn’t mean it’s not legitimate.

How much should you donate?

Again, this is a personal decision.

Kevin Scally, the chief relationship officer for Charity Navigator, said that since the beginning of the pandemic, his group has seen giving on its own platform increase by 30% to an average gift of $130 per household, compared with the same period last year.

The Lily Family School of Philanthropy at Indiana University compiled a generosity map, where you can explore how much people give in your area. There are also fact sheets with various statistics to explore, and a Give-O-Meter, where you can plug in your own demographic information and see how you compare to those like you.

Alexander DePaoli, a marketing professor at Northeastern University, warned against overthinking when choosing to whom and how much to donate. DePaoli, who researches the effects of emotion in consumer reasoning, said you'll get the most

Hello. It looks like you're using an ad blocker that may prevent our website from working properly. To receive the best experience possible, please make sure any blockers are switched off and refresh the page.

If you have any questions or need help you can email us

Distributed by Tribune Content Agency, LLC.

Accounting • Benefits • Income Tax • Small Business

CPA Practice Advisor is registered with the National Association of State Boards of Accountancy (NASBA) as a sponsor of continuing professional education on the National Registry of CPE Sponsors.

© 2024 Firmworks, LLC. All rights reserved