and a controversial "millionaire's tax" are notably missing from the final version of the bill.

Ken Berry • Jul. 29, 2022

Due to an unexpected change of heart by swing vote Senator Joe Manchin (D-WV), the prospects for passage of the Inflation Reduction Act are considered to be brighter today than they were just a short time ago. This new legislation is a scaled-down version of the Build Back Better plan that the Biden administration has advocated for the last year and a half. If Manchin helps push the bill through the Senate, the House could sign off on it in early August.

Among other aspects, the new law incentivizes climate control and domestic manufacturing efforts, extends health insurance subsidies under the Affordable Care Act (ACA), permits Medicare to negotiate drug prices and makes strides toward deficit reduction and curbing inflation.

It also includes significant tax changes, although a tougher international tax regime statement income” for this purpose.

Carried interest rules: The Act closes a tax loophole that has been in Congress’ cross hairs for years. Under current “carried interest” rules, compensation paid to managers of certain investment entities is taxed at favorable long-term capital gain rates instead of high-taxed ordinary income rates, after a three-year holding period is met. Generally, these managers would have to meet a five-year holding period to qualify for long-term capital gain.

Energy credits: A wide range of energy credits for the business sector are expanded and/or extended. In addition, consumers are encouraged to “go green” by investing in renewable energy sources. Buyers of new electric vehicles (EVs) will be eligible for a $7,500 credit for EVs placed in service before 2033, while the manufacturer’s limit is eliminated for EVs sold after 2022. Also, a credit of up to $4,000 will be available on purchases of previously-owned EVs. Finally, the residential energy property credit for homeowners is extended until it begins to phase out in 2033.

IRS enforcement and administration: The Act appropriates $3.18 billion for the IRS to provide taxpayer and other services. In an effort to close an estimated $441 billion tax gap, it also appropriates $45.6 billion for necessary expenses for the IRS to:

- Determine and collect taxes;
- Provide legal and litigation support;
- Conduct criminal investigations (including investigative technology);
- Provide digital asset monitoring and compliance activities;
- Enforce criminal statutes related to violations of the Internal Revenue Code and other financial crimes;

- Purchase and hire passenger motor vehicles; and
